Magdalena Wysocka and Claudio Pogo have been working together as an artist duo since 2016. Trained as a printmaker and photographer respectively, their collaborative work bridges a variety of related mediums, ranging from large scale print works to handmade artists' books. Their practice is centered around collecting and recontextualization, whereby imagery, sourced from found photographs, books and other archival materials, is reinterpreted and given a new form. The viewer slows down to rethink what value, appeal or use might still be found in these images today. By removing or sparingly using text (and specific context), the artists generously create an opening for us to make new meaning of what has been offered and is being offered again.

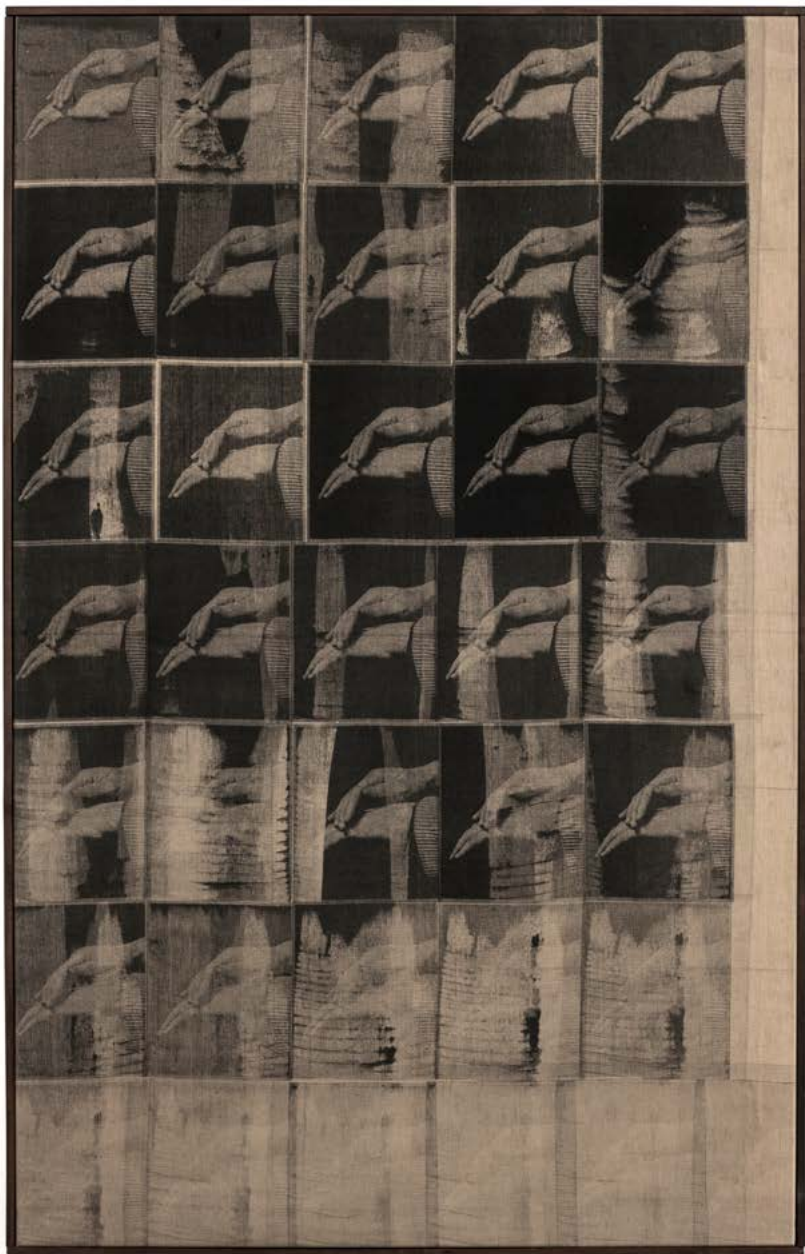

In keeping with the nature of their source material, Wysocka and Pogo turn to Risography—duplication printing technique from the 1960's, to drive the aesthetic throughline of their work. They purposefully push the machine's boundaries through experimentation to heighten elements of chance and unpredictability of the new, reprinted matter. The duo counterbalances more narrative work, which takes the form of smaller-scale, editioned handmade books, with unique individual prints that exist as large-scale canvas works. In the former, the laborious bookbinding process is slow, calculated and precise. The latter is a playful opening, an intuitive and uncontrolled exploration, wherein the artists reinvented the traditional printing process of Risography, flipping its serial nature on its head to instead produce one of a kind monotypes.

Wysocka and Pogo find beauty hidden in imperfections. Their practice is about the things one does not and cannot know, about finding and highlighting what usually goes unnoticed.
